

Monday, January 23, 2012

In this issue:

- New survey explores how non-profits communicate outside their organizations
-

New survey explores how non-profits communicate outside their organizations

The School of Journalism and Communications at Carleton University, in partnership with Volunteer Canada, invites you to participate in a new survey about how non-profits communicate to their stakeholders. The attached survey seeks to understand how non-profit organizations are communicating outside their organizations, the goals and objectives for these communications activities, and the capacities to maintain and support these efforts. The data generated from the survey will inform ongoing research into the role of communication in supporting non-profit activities and will also inform the development of new resources to assist voluntary organizations in their communications and capacity building work.

Click here to complete the survey.

For more information about the survey, please contact Georgina Grosenick of Carleton University at grosenickg@shaw.ca.